REVIEWER 1

General Comments	The researcher has conducted a unique study, which is claimed to be not done by the researchers of the area. The sexual violence in the education sector has become a growing problem these days. The researcher has further narrowed down the approach to the Islamic universities. As claimed by the author the research related to secular and Christian universities (pg.3, 16). The restorative justice aspect related to sexual violence cases has been raised by the author. Despite the overwhelming majority of students whose opinion was sought were less favourable in having the implementation of the restorative justice in such cases (pg. 10), the study is a well-researched piece nevertheless and establishes at least one opinion, that despite its advantages and least tedious procedure, the restorative justice is not the preferred option for the victim, owing to the sensitivity of the matter and the harm such offences cause to the victim. The study is confined to the Islamic universities situated in South Sulawesi Province, Indonesia (pg. 7), whereby the google form was circulated amongst the students enrolled in the universities who were given an overview of the purpose of the study, before attempting the questionnaire (pg. no. 7). The very first graphical representation that shows that there exist cases of sexual violence in Islamic Universities and to some level the restorative justice is implemented. But, interesting to note that almost all the responders were strongly disagreeing to the implementation of the Restorative Justice in sexual violence cases (pg. 10). The table 2 (pg. 11), shows an interesting figure of more than 80% of the respondents strongly agreeing to the strict punishment and administration of sexual violence cases, which apparently is against the Restorative Justice, which is least punitive and more restorative in character. In table 3 (pg. 13), the interesting facts which came out are that a substantial respondents want a specialised units dedicated to handle the cases of sexual violence, with much needed care and diligence required in such cases. Another point which came to light is that a substantial number of respondents see victim recovery as the main priority in sexual violence cases, thus, favouring implementation of restorative justice in such cases, that prioritizes victim's restoration.
Detailed Feedback	Page no./ section (if applicable)	As it has been pointed out in the previous section at length, the approach, context, and some interesting facts of the research piece, here the page numbers shall be mentioned with the changes that are suggested. First and foremost, the author has chosen the word, 'Sexual Violence' and not 'Sexual Harassment', and if the word 'violence' is used then why not in the table 3 (pg. 13), the sexual assault or rape is mentioned. In the same table the word 'pornographic acts', does not convey any concrete act, so what does the author mean by that? On Page no. 9, the author has mentioned the respondents chosen for the research, but, whether it comprises of females only or both has not been clarified. If that is clarified, the answers to the questionnaire could be seen as evidence of that gender or both genders, whatever the

		case may be. On page no. 4, the objectives of the research mentioned in the paragraph (not in points) does not match up the research undertaken, as there is no mention of any other method of resolving the sexual violence cases than through Restorative Justice, so how the objective of it being the most effective of the method to resolve such cases can be attained? There is no mention of any other method or approach undertaken by the Universities in addressing such cases, but the second point in the paragraph suggests that the study includes it, which is contradictory without mentioning the current procedure universities follow other than the restorative justice in such cases. The Islamic point of view on dealing such cases by way of restorative justice on page. 17, needs a much more detailed discussion by mentioning the Hadiths followed by Fatawas, if available on such issue. The verses of the Quran as mentioned by the author are not conclusively establishing the points raised in Question 9 and 13 on page. 13. In the entire research piece the author has not mentioned the absence of deterrence in the restorative justice approach, that could give rise to such cases and becoming a common phenomenon. The question 1 on page. 11, that shows that an overwhelming majority of the responders are in favor of a deterrent punishment for the perpetrator, that is missing in case of restorative justice. The author needs to mention that aspect, that what would happen if the sexual violence cases became too common because of the lack of deterrence in restorative justice approach. The author has no where mentioned in the research piece the local law of the land, to handle the cases of sexual violence, that way the author could have compared the negatives of the law of the land with that of the restorative justice approach and then suggesting the restorative justice, a better approach for dealing with the cases of sexual violence. In other words, the author has only mentioned about restorative justice approach and has not mentioned the flaws of the current law of the land results in demand for an approach of restorative justice. The conclusion of the study could have been a more detailed one, reflecting on every table consisting of questions, and then suggestions by the researcher may follow.
Methodology		There needs to be mentioned the limitations as to the methodology adopted by the author. Secondly, that instead of 'Method Section', 'Methodology', may be used.
Research ethics		Yes, the research ethics are followed by the author. The research piece is well designed with well defined objectives, barring the objection raised in the precious sections and has adhered to the societal norms, while surveying for the study.
Article Structure		The article structure could be more impressive, as the author has not mentioned the 'introduction' section at the very onset of the article, but instead mentioned, 'literature review'. The other subheadings may be short and well defined, which now is barely visible and hard to differentiate from the main text.
Language (grammar/spelling)		The grammar and spelling mistakes are not many and the few of those are suggested to be corrected in the word format of the document.
Language (tone/expression)		The tone and expression of the article is inquisitive on a few occasions, while conclusive on many, as if presupposing the restorative justice to be the apt method to resolve the sexual violence cases. The author needs to maintain uniformity in the approach while addressing the issue.
Referencing		The paper conforms to APA style.
Is the paper a good fit for the IJRJ?		Yes, but the law of the land and its inefficacy in dealing with the sexual violence cases and the issue of deterrence that is absent in restorative justice approach needs to be mentioned by the author. Also, needs to be mentioned is the approach undertaken by the Islamic Universities in dealing with sexual violence cases in absence pf restorative justice. Last and most importantly, as the author deals with the Islamic Universities and deals with the country specific with substantial Muslim population, the author needs to well establish the fact that the resolving of sexual violence cases through restorative justice is in line with the Islamic values and traditions.

Does the paper make a solid contribution to policy and research?		Yes, but only after incorporating the above suggestions.

The title of the paper is “Restorative Justice in Resolving Sexual Violence case in Islamic Universities: The Perception of Students in Indonesia”. While I believe this topic fills an important gap in the field, the paper does not “hone in” on these issues. The first 3 pages offers broad strokes general statements and platitudes on the topic of sexual assault. The reader is first introduced to the scope of the paper on page 4 when the author notes that the research focuses on the following three questions, 1. What is the perception of students concerning the issue of sexual violence in Islamic universities? 2. How do students perceive the concept of restorative justice in Islamic universities 3. What is the perception of students towards the implementation of restorative justice in a bid to resolve sexual violence cases in Islamic universities? This discussion should be in the first initial pages of the paper, not on page 4. Moreover, after presenting these three questions the author then discusses the “objective” of the research. The objectives should be restructured to align more with the three research questions initially presented.

In the section titled “Conclusion’, the author states, “The complexities made it challenging to assess the effectiveness of Islamic universities in addressing these cases. “What complexities?” Explain.

The research in this paper has field value however the paper is poorly organized. The author often makes broad strokes general statements. The paper has several run on sentences that are confusing. The paper needs restructuring and editing.

General Comments

The researcher has conducted a unique study, which is claimed to be not done by the researchers of the area. The sexual violence in the education sector has become a growing problem these days. The researcher has further narrowed down the approach to the Islamic universities. As claimed by the author the research related to secular and Christian universities (pg.3, 16). The restorative justice aspect related to sexual violence cases has been raised by the author. Despite the overwhelming majority of students whose opinion was sought were less favourable in having the implementation of the restorative justice in such cases (pg. 10), the study is a well-researched piece nevertheless and establishes at least one opinion, that despite its advantages and least tedious procedure, the restorative justice is not the preferred option for the victim, owing to the sensitivity of the matter and the harm such offences cause to the victim. The study is confined to the Islamic universities situated in South Sulawesi Province, Indonesia (pg. 7), whereby the google form was circulated amongst the students enrolled in the universities who were given an overview of the purpose of the study, before attempting the questionnaire (pg. no. 7). The very first graphical representation that shows that there exist cases of sexual violence in Islamic Universities and to some level the restorative justice is implemented. But, interesting to note that almost all the responders were strongly disagreeing to the implementation of the Restorative Justice in sexual violence cases (pg. 10). The table 2 (pg. 11), shows an interesting figure of more than 80% of the respondents strongly agreeing to the strict punishment and administration of sexual violence cases, which apparently is against the Restorative Justice, which is least punitive and more restorative in character. In table 3 (pg. 13), the interesting facts which came out are that a substantial respondents want a specialised units dedicated to handle the cases of sexual violence, with much needed care and diligence required in such cases. Another point which came to light is that a substantial number of respondents see victim recovery as the main priority in sexual violence cases, thus, favouring implementation of restorative justice in such cases, that prioritizes victim's restoration.

Detailed Feedback	Page no./ section (if applicable)	As it has been pointed out in the previous section at length, the approach, context, and some interesting facts of the research piece, here the page numbers shall be mentioned with the changes that are suggested. First and foremost, the author has chosen the word, 'Sexual Violence' and not 'Sexual Harassment', and if the word 'violence' is used then why not in the table 3 (pg. 13), the sexual assault or rape is mentioned. In the same table the word 'pornographic acts', does not convey any concrete act, so what does the author mean by that? On Page no. 9, the author has mentioned the respondents chosen for the research, but, whether it comprises of females only or both has not been clarified. If that is clarified, the answers to the questionnaire could be seen as evidence of that gender or both genders, whatever the case may be. On page no. 4, the objectives of the research mentioned in the paragraph (not in points) does not match up the research undertaken, as there is no mention of any other method of resolving the sexual violence cases than through Restorative Justice, so how the objective of it being the most effective of the method to resolve such cases can be attained? There is no mention of any other method or approach undertaken by the Universities in addressing such cases, but the second point in the paragraph suggests that the study includes it, which is contradictory without mentioning the current procedure universities follow other than the restorative justice in such cases. The Islamic point of view on dealing such cases by way of restorative justice on page. 17, needs a much more detailed discussion by mentioning the Hadiths followed by Fatawas, if available on such issue. The verses of the Quran as mentioned by the author are not conclusively establishing the points raised in Question 9 and 13 on page. 13. In the entire research piece the author has not mentioned the absence of deterrence in the restorative justice approach, that could give rise to such cases and becoming a common phenomenon. The question 1 on page. 11, that shows that an overwhelming majority of the responders are in favor of a deterrent punishment for the perpetrator, that is missing in case of restorative justice. The author needs to mention that aspect, that what would happen if the sexual violence cases became too common because of the lack of deterrence in restorative justice approach. The author has no where mentioned in the research piece the local law of the land, to handle the cases of sexual violence, that way the author could have compared the negatives of the law of the land with that of the restorative justice approach and then suggesting the restorative justice, a better approach for dealing with the cases of sexual violence. In other words, the author has only mentioned about restorative justice approach and has not mentioned the flaws of the current law of the land results in demand for an approach of restorative justice. The conclusion of the study could have been a more detailed one, reflecting on every table consisting of questions, and then suggestions by the researcher may follow.
Methodology		There needs to be mentioned the limitations as to the methodology adopted by the author. Secondly, that instead of 'Method Section', 'Methodology', may be used.
Research ethics		Yes, the research ethics are followed by the author. The research piece is well designed with well defined objectives, barring the objection raised in the precious sections and has adhered to the societal norms, while surveying for the study.
Article Structure		The article structure could be more impressive, as the author has not mentioned the 'introduction' section at the very onset of the article, but instead mentioned, 'literature review'. The other subheadings may be short and well defined, which now is barely visible and hard to differentiate from the main text.

Language (grammar/spelling)		The grammar and spelling mistakes are not many and the few of those are suggested to be corrected in the word format of the document.
Language (tone/expression)		The tone and expression of the article is inquisitive on a few occasions, while conclusive on many, as if presupposing the restorative justice to be the apt method to resolve the sexual violence cases. The author needs to maintain uniformity in the approach while addressing the issue.
Referencing		The paper conforms to APA style.
Is the paper a good fit for the IJRJ?		Yes, but the law of the land and its inefficacy in dealing with the sexual violence cases and the issue of deterrence that is absent in restorative justice approach needs to be mentioned by the author. Also, needs to be mentioned is the approach undertaken by the Islamic Universities in dealing with sexual violence cases in absence of restorative justice. Last and most importantly, as the author deals with the Islamic Universities and deals with the country specific with substantial Muslim population, the author needs to well establish the fact that the resolving of sexual violence cases through restorative justice is in line with the Islamic values and traditions.
Does the paper make a solid contribution to policy and research?		Yes, but only after incorporating the above suggestions.

The title of the paper is “Restorative Justice in Resolving Sexual Violence case in Islamic Universities: The Perception of Students in Indonesia”. While I believe this topic fills an important gap in the field, the paper does not “hone in” on these issues. The first 3 pages offers broad strokes general statements and platitudes on the topic of sexual assault. The reader is first introduced to the scope of the paper on page 4 when the author notes that the research focuses on the following three questions, 1. What is the perception of students concerning the issue of sexual violence in Islamic universities? 2. How do students perceive the concept of restorative justice in Islamic universities 3. What is the perception of students towards the implementation of restorative justice in a bid to resolve sexual violence cases in Islamic universities? This discussion should be in the first initial pages of the paper, not on page 4. Moreover, after presenting these three questions the author then discusses the “objective “of the research. The objectives should be restructured to align more with the three research questions initially presented.

In the section titled "Conclusion", the author states, "The complexities made it challenging to assess the effectiveness of Islamic universities in addressing these cases. "What complexities?" Explain.

The research in this paper has field value however the paper is poorly organized. The author often makes broad strokes general statements. The paper has several run on sentences that are confusing. The paper needs restructuring and editing.
