ACKNOWLEDGMENT

Alhamdulillah rabbil 'alamin. First, the writer would like to begin by expressing their gratitude to God Almighty, Allah Subhanahu Wata'ala, for His unending mercy, faith, and guidance that have made it possible for them to finish study at the State Islamic University of Alauddin Makassar. Shalawat and salam are addressed to our prophet Muhammad SAW, the best who has given strength, motivation, and inspiration to humanity.

The writer is aware that without the assistance, backing, direction, inspiration, criticism, encouragement, and advice from numerous people, the writer would not have been able to conduct this study. The writer would therefore like to express his deepest gratitude to the following:

1. The writer's beloved parents, Abubakar Padma and Hajerah, for all their prayers, supports and eternally affections as the biggest influence in her success and happy life.
2. The writer's beloved siblings for their encouragement and heartfelt prayers for the writer's success.
3. Prof Hamdan Juhannis M.A Ph.D as the Rector of Alauddin State Islamic University of Makassar.
4. Thank you for the support, encouragement, and assistance from the Dean of the Faculty of Adab and Humanities, Hasyim Haddade, S.Ag., M.Ag, Dr. Jumharia Djamereng, M.Hum as Head of the English Language and Literature Department and Syahrani Junaid, SS. M.Pd as Secretary of the Department of English Language and Literature.

5. The deepest gratitude to the writer's dedicated supervisors, Dr. H. Dahlan, M.Hum and Dr. Rosmah Tami, S.Ag.,M.Sc.,MA. who have helped, guided, and supported the writer during the writing of this thesis.
6. The researcher's gratitude is also due to her examiners, Dr. Muh. Syukri, S.S., M.Hum and Dr. Nasrum, S.Pd., M.A. for their advices, criticism, and suggestions.
7. A heartfelt thanks is addressed to the writer's beloved friends in English Literature Department, especially For AG 5-6, for giving the writer's a wonderful experiment during college life and writing this thesis.
8. Special thanks to my best college friends, Suci Rahmayani, Mia Audina, Dina Maulidah, Wanda Dwi Cahya, Muthmainnah, Imam Ahmad Turmuzi, Vira Pratiwiand Dinda Dwi Pratiwi for always support and encourage the writer.
9. Endless gratitude to my partner, Andi Muhammad Sandi, who always gives his encouragement, patience, brings a lot of joy to her life, and as her inspiration, the writer's can pass this journey to finish one step in her life.
10. Deepest thanks to my best friend, Marianna Renata and Putri Pratiwi who always push the writer to finish her study. Everyday, they always accompany and help the writer to boost her mood.
11. Deepest gratitude to all family member of Komunitas Peduli Anak Jalanan Kota Makassar. And also the writer's little sweethearts in Rumah Belajar Komunitas Peduli Anak Jalanan for saving her life and bring a lot of happiness to her life.

12. Sending love to all the member of Sahabat Netra for teaches the writer meaning of grateful.

13. Thanks to Nadin Amizah, Hindia, and Kunto Aji whose songs always accompany the author in working on this thesis.

14. Deepest gratitude to all EXO members who always bring happiness in the midst of the storms that the writer experiences in her life. Especially for Do Kyung Soo who always brings light and smiles to the writer, and his songs that always strengthen the writer to survive through the storm.

15. Last but not least, thanks to myself for persevering and fighting this far.

Thank you for believing that this stage will be passed. This thesis is a writer's work written since November 2020 and completed in September 2023. This thesis is a silent witness to this bloody struggle; loneliness, inauthenticity, alienation, betrayal, and uncertainty of life are a necessity for the writer, but (still) a possibility for humans in general.

The writer stated honestly that this study is far from adequate.

Remaining mistakes are the writer's own; constructive observations and suggestion would also be greatly appreciated.

Thesis Title : Trauma and Reconciliation Of The Main Character's
Trauma in A.J. Finn's The Woman In The Window
Supervisor 1 : Dr. Dahlan, M.Hum
Supervisor 2 : Dr. Rosmah Tami, S.Ag. M.Sc. M.A.

This study aims to describe and reconstruct the trauma and reconciliation of the main character on The Woman In The Window by A.J. Finn. The study used descriptive qualitative method using the theory of trauma by Cathy Caruth and concept of acting out and working through by Dominic LaCapra. This study is conducted through methods as follow, (1) defining formal and material objects, (2) data gathering, (3) data analyzing, and (4) taking a conclusion. The results showed that the main character experienced the accident with her husband and daughter became a personal traumatic memory. The event is remembered as a traumatic memory and causes trauma, as reflected in the symptoms of flashbacks, hallucination, agoraphobia, denial, feeling of guilt, death-drive, uncontrolled anger, self-destructive. The main character experience acting out, stuck in the past. In an attempt at reconciliation, the main character in the novel performs self-acceptance, steps out of his house, returns to his job, and accepts reality without feeling guilty anymore.

CHAPTER 1

INTRODUCTION

A. Background of the Study

Human life is an intriguing phenomena despite all of its complications and issues, including horrible traumatic experiences such as the death of a loved one, accidents, abuses, or natural disasters. Such traumatic events can occur without warning to someone who is not mentally prepared, and this can also traumatize people. According to the American Psychiatric Association, responses to incidents that are "beyond the range of typical human experience," such as created by humans and natural disasters, are referred to as traumatic events or traumatic neurosis (Caruth, 1995). Trauma can occur to anyone who directly or indirectly encounters or witnesses the event. A confrontation with actual or threatened death, serious harm, or sexual abuse can occur.

These days, trauma refers not only to physical injuries but also psychological injuries. According to "Survivor Experience and Trauma Syndrome", written by psychologist Robert Jay Lifton, survivors are traumatized when facing death. Since facing death forces one to reconsider their ultimate purpose in life, he argues that it causes psychological disorder (Lifton, 1995: 131). Since the late nineteenth century, when trauma and its own theory first developed, it has been intensively debated, examined, and contemplated. It became a significant topic in post-war studies after World War I (Balaev, 2014: 4). Trauma study has also moved outside psychiatry and into the literature. Literature represents human existence and offers readers a variety of perceives that allow them to reflect on the varied human responses to overwhelming situations reflected in the flow of dread, such as those found in poetry, fiction, or movies. According to Vickroy (2014), fiction exemplifies the different ways a survivor's story can transmit the voice of trauma. It outlines the events and aspects of the traumatic experience. As a result, trauma is depicted in fiction as an indescribable wound in human life through traumatic stories.

Literature as a portrayal of human existence in which the author is a member of society thus provides a hyperrealist work of art. Thus, literature cannot be detached from the representation of human life. It is interesting to observe literary works in regard to viewing literary works as representations of life. In this study, the writer also attempt to assess novels that depict facets of human existence, particularly those dealing with mental issues and the psychological impact of traumatic experiences.

The theory of trauma first appeared in Caruth's book, Unclaimed Experience (1996). In the original sense, trauma comes from the Greek word tráuma which refers to a "wound" or bodily injury. However, the current usage of the word trauma reflects more of an injury to the mind rather than an injury to the body (Caruth 1996, 3). According to Caruth, this trauma is a response to a sudden or catastrophic experience or event in the form of recurrent hallucinations. or a catastrophe in the form of recurrent, uncontrollable hallucinations and other intrusive phenomena (1996, 11). Caruth asserts that this phenomenon returns to disturb later in life with symptoms, including flashbacks, nightmares, and other repetitive phenomena (1996, 91)

Trauma is interdisciplinary, involving several academic fields like literature, history, sociology, and psychology. When discussing the idea of trauma in literature, Caruth (1996) asserts that literary works can be used as a tool to convey the nature of trauma by its witnesses. Literature, in the words of Caruth (1996), "opens our ears to experiences that may not be spoken or heard" and "allows us to bear witness to events that cannot be fully understood" (Abubakar, 2017). As well as inspiring readers to empathize with the victim's terrible experience and take action to stop the same thing from happening again. As a result, literary works not only serve as enjoyable fictitious stories, but also as a means for giving voice to traumatic events that have occurred.

Traumatic incidents, experiences, and effects have been described in literary works such as Speaks by Laurie Halse Anderson, Room by Emma Donoghue, Surfacing by Margaret Atwood, The Farming of Bones by Edwidge Danticat, The Girl on the Train by Paula Hawkins, and The Woman in the Window by A.J. Finn.

The Woman In The Window by American author A.J. Finn, published in 2018, examines the topic of trauma and the process of reconciliation. The novel revolves around a child psychologist named Anna Fox who goes through her experiences related to the trauma of losing her family in a tragic accident that caused Anna to suffer from Agoraphobia. Anna Fox is trying to make peace with herself against the past traumas that continue to haunt her. Anna Fox reconciles with her trauma in an unusual way. She was able to come to terms with her trauma after being confronted with a murder she witnessed.

The novel explains that Anna Fox has Agoraphobia, which is the result of a traumatic event she experienced with her family. However, Anna Fox showed persistence in warding off and forgetting all bad memories and tried to overcome her feelings of trauma through the tragic events she witnessed and wanted to uncover the truth. This is what is so interesting to study in relation to the bad memories that Anna Fox experienced that caused long-term trauma. Besides, the efforts shown by Anna Fox in responding to all forms of memory and trauma are interesting topics to be analyzed more deeply.

When a person experiences trauma with all the symptoms that follow, it will make the individual feel disturbed in carrying out daily activities. For this reason, some must think about how to recover and make peace with the trauma. We can make various efforts to reconcile or simply distract from the trauma. These efforts are also called reconciliation. Kelman (2010) said that:

“...Successful conflict resolution leads to reconciliation. It appears at the end of the process, gradually. Much is being tested, and the process that is producing it supports ultimate reconciliation. This does not imply, and I don't believe it ever has, that reconciliation occurs only once an agreement is reached. However, reconciliation is both a process and a final outcome.” (Kelman, 2010).

According to Kelman, reconciliation is an attempt to make peace after a conflict. In the context of this study, the conflict in question is an internal conflict experienced by individuals due to a traumatic event.

Moreover, in relation to Islamic religion, Allah SWT mentions in the Qur'an Q.S Al-Baqarah : 286 that Allah never burdens something to his servant beyond his ability :

لَا يُكَلِّفُ اللَّهُ نَفْسًا إِلَّا وُسْعَهَا لَهَا مَا كَسَبَتْ وَعَلَيْهَا مَا اكْتَسَبَتْ

“Allah does not charge a soul except [with that within] its capacity. It will have [the consequence of] what [good] it has gained, and it will bear [the consequence of] what [evil] it has earned.”

Likewise with trauma, there are many ways that can be done to reconcile with the trauma experienced. Even with the way of events beyond our reasoning.

The Woman In The Window by A.J. Finn has been the subject of several journal papers and theses. The topics discussed are quite varied, especially psychoanalysis and illocutionary. The first study is titled The Anxiety and Defense Mechanism of Ana as The Main Character Depicted in The Novel The Woman in The Window (2020). In this study, there are two categories of anxiety that were experienced by Anna. They are realistic anxiety and moralistic anxiety. Realistic anxiety by Anna is because of the terror from Alistar and imposter Jane. Second, Utterances In The Woman In The Window Movie: An Analysis of Illocutionary Act (2022). The study reveals that four types of illocutionary act: 18 assertive, 6 directives, commissive, and 5 expressive utterances are used by the main character in attempting to investigate a murder. The purposes of the illocutionary act are to conclude, to state as assertive utterances, to ask, to request, to order, to command, to beg as directives utterances, to make a duty to herself as commissive utterances, and to apologize, to dislike, to thank as expressive utterances. The dominant utterance used was assertive which carries the value of true or false. It indicates that the main character was trying hard to convince the police officer of what she said was true. Interestingly, only one commissive utterance was used to prove what she saw was true. It explains the condition of the main character with agoraphobia.

There has been no previous research that discusses the object of this study using trauma theory by Cathy Caruth and the concept of acting out and working through by Dominick LaCapra. It can be said that this study is up-to-date. In addition, this study will explain the trauma and the main character's reconciliation of trauma in The Woman in The Window by A.J. Finn.

B. Problem Statement

Based on the previous background, the following research question was developed:

1. How is the trauma experienced by the main character in the novel?
2. How do the main character in the novel reconcile with the trauma experienced?

C. Objectives of the Study

A writer should have an objective to be achieved through its study. The objective here is as the answer of the particular questions in statement of the problem. In here, there is an objective to be achieved in this study. They are stated as follows:

1. Trauma experienced by the main character of The Woman In The Window
2. Reconciliation of the Main Character's Trauma in The Woman In The Window Novel

D. Scope of The Study

A.J. Finn's novel The Woman in the Window has numerous case studies. As a result, this study will focus on just analyzing Trauma and Reconciliation of The Main Character's Trauma in The Woman in the Window by A.J. Finn.

E. Significance of The Study

The writer expects that the findings of this study will be beneficial as references in future research, as well as to the reader who is interested in Trauma and Reconciliation of the Main Character's Trauma in The Woman in the Window by A.J. Finn.

CHAPTER II

LITERARY REVIEW

A. Previous Studies

Existing research on the subject has lately been published in a number of publications. In 2020, Magazen Kharisma Firdausya released "The Archetype of Shadow in A.J. Finn's The Woman In The Window" which explores the shadow archetypes experienced by the main character, Anna Fox. Based on Carl Jung's hypothesis, the researcher discovered six shadow archetypes in this research. Social anxiety, limiting beliefs, sexually deviant conduct, excessive rage, harmful associations, and neuroticism.

Furthermore, the study released by Zulia Khikmatul Maulidia "The Innocent Killer: Ethan's Manipulation in A.J. Finn's The Woman In The Window" (2021) was published in the Sunan Ampel Surabaya State Islamic University's Digital Library. This study aims to discover the reasons behind Ethan Russell's manipulation in A.J. Finn's The Woman in the Window. Three different ways are used by Ethan to manipulate Anna. He exploited his persona side of the three tactics he employed to persuade Anna. Ethan first pretends to be Grandma Lizzie, using Grandma Lizzie's identity; then Ethan creates a fake scenario, using Grandma Lizzie's and a victim of violence's identities; and finally, Ethan gives false testimony, using the identities of a victim of violence, a good teenager, and a crybaby character.

In addition, the UNISSULA Institutional Repository published a paper titled "Anxiety and Defense Mechanisms of Anna as the Main Character Described in the Novel The Woman In The Window by A.J. Finn" written by Ama Amalia (2020). This study describes the novel's main character, Anna Fox's, defense mechanisms and anxieties. What is intriguing about this study is that the researcher discovered two sorts of anxiousness in Anna Fox. There is moral anxiety as well as real anxiety. Furthermore, researchers discovered that Anna Fox coped with her anxiety by using defense mechanisms such as repression, rationalization, displacement, invalidation, denial, and reaction development.

This literature review shows that there are still many aspects of this object that we can explore more deeply. The writer discovered that A.J. Finn's The Woman In The Window had never been analyzed through the framework of Caruth's trauma theory. The writer discovered that this study differs significantly from earlier studies that employed the identical case. The focus of this study is on the construction of trauma experienced by the main character, Anna Fox, and how she reconcile with the trauma.

B. Related Theories

1. Trauma

In her book, Caruth defines trauma as follows :

"Trauma is a response, sometimes delayed, to an overwhelming event or events, which takes the form of repeated, intrusive hallucinations, dreams, thoughts or behaviors stemming from the event, along with numbing that may have begun during or after the experience, and possibly also increased arousal to (and avoidance of) stimuli recalling the event" (Caruth, 1995: 4).

Trauma, as defined by Caruth, is a delayed reaction to recollections of previous traumatic experiences that have not been fully acknowledged, accepted, or recognized as part of the survivor's life history. Trauma survivors frequently develop hallucinations as a result of the events or experiences they have encountered. These occurrences might manifest as nightmares, thoughts, memories, and behaviors of the survivor. Furthermore, survivors may be frightened of the objects around them as a result of the traumatic event they witnessed, or they may strive to avoid items that remind them of the event. However, a person who experiences a traumatic event does not immediately understand the event as trauma. As Caruth says:

"The event is not assimilated or experienced fully at the time, but only belatedly, in its repeated possession of the one who experiences it. To be traumatized is precisely to be possessed by an image or event" (Caruth, 1996: 3).

According to Whitehead in Caruth, trauma is an issue that is strongly tied to both mental health and real life. Trauma has presented us with not only a simple disease, but also with a fundamental mystery concerning the psyche's relationship to reality. Trauma is defined broadly as the reaction to an unexpected or overwhelming violent incident or occurrences that are not fully comprehended at the time but resurface later in recurring flashbacks, nightmares, and other repetitive phenomena. (Caruth, 1996: 91)

The problem of trauma is not as easy to deal with as one might think, trauma holds many memories or bad experiences that can surface at any time. Furthermore, trauma can also be said to be a response that can be obtained when getting bad memories, such as incomprehensible events.

In this case, trauma is a consciously experienced response and effect of an unpleasant memory or experience that resurfaces. Like nightmares, nightmares occur because of the fear of something that has been experienced. In other words, the trauma of the nightmare is the part of the memory that you don't want to remember. As Cathy says in her book Unclaimed Experience is as follows:

“Traumatic experience, beyond the psychological dimension of suffering it involves, suggests a certain paradox. that the most direct seeing of a violent event may occur as an absolute inability to know it; that immediacy, paradoxically, may take the form of belatedness.”

(Caruth, 1996 : 91-92)

A person who has had a traumatic experience will show several symptoms that have been categorized by the American Psychiatric Association as follows:

1.1. Intrusions

People who experienced trauma have a tendency to recollect the events that occurred even after the danger has passed. They are unable to live normal lives because of the recurrent trauma that bothers them. It's as if the trauma has stopped time. The trauma is stored in atypical memories and enters consciousness on its own. This can manifest as a flashback while waking or as a horrific nightmare while sleeping. Seemingly insignificant reminders can also revive these memories, which often return with all the vividness and emotional power of the original event. As a result, even in places that are usually safe for survivors, it may not be possible to find such reminders of trauma. (Herman, 1993)

Intrusions can include dreams, intrusive memories, and emotional and physical overreactions to situations reminiscent of the trauma. Kinzie et al (1984) support the assertion, according to Marzillier and Steel (2007), intrusions are defined as unwanted and uncontrollable thoughts, images, memories and urges that involve re-experiencing traumatic events and are associated with high levels of distress. There are two forms of recalling a traumatic event: reliving it in your head or experiencing flashbacks, and having nightmares. A person becomes traumatized as a result of these repeated painful experiences, which cast a shadow over their existence. (Rahayu & Satriawan, 2020)

Flashbacks are intrusions that are dominated by comprehensive recollections of traumatic events, such as visual images and noises heard in the past. According to Lee (2009:4), "flashbacks are vivid and emotional sensory experiences that seem to bring back the sensory impressions of previous experiences, so that one feels alive again."

During the flashback, a considerable bodily and emotional response is frequently present. After recalling, you may have headaches, uncontrolled shaking, an accelerated heart rate, feeling cold, and other physical symptoms. Terror and numbness can be experienced as emotional reactions to experiences. (Mendato, 2010)

Traumatic dreams differ from usual dreams. These dreams have many characteristics with terrible recollections experienced while waking. These dreams frequently include fragments of traumatic events in identical form, sometimes with little or no imaginative elaboration. The same dream occurs on a regular basis. These dreams are frequently frightening, as if they are happening right now. It is likely that the minor, unimportant external triggers that occur during these dreams are foreshadowing indicators of an impending attack that would cause violent reactions. Traumatic nightmares can sometimes occur during stages of sleep when people do not ordinarily dream. As a result, traumatic memories appear to be founded on a neurophysiological arrangement that changes both during sleep and in daily life. (Herman, 1993)

1.2. Avoidance

Unpleasant memories can emerge from within a person's psyche and manifest as present-day invasions. A distressed person tries to prevent the flashback's influence by avoiding the thought or scenario, especially if the recollection is frightening and unpleasant. According to Hayes et al (1996)

“Avoidance happens when a person employs tactics to mitigate, change, or control uncomfortable personal experiences such as thoughts, emotions, and bodily sensations.” (cited from Thompson & Waltz, 2010).

Avoidance manifests itself in the avoidance of locations and thoughts linked with the trauma, difficulties recalling the event, a noticeable loss of interest in other essential elements of one's life, restricted emotions, and a sense of growing distance from the future. The person suffering from the intrusion attempts to avoid recalling the memories so that the fear does not take over their life. For example, after a tragic vehicle accident, a person may avoid driving or being in a car due to the fear and dread that being in a car.

The effect of avoidance behavior is the fact that it decreases an individual's possibilities to interact with others. It causes feelings of loneliness, tension, and other negative emotions. Individuals suffering with this symptom will avoid interacting with others. Someone who engages in avoidance behavior feels that avoiding certain situations will make his life simpler. Indeed, it would make his life more unhappy and lonely.

1.3. Hyperarousal

"Hyperarousal" is defined by Foa et al. as "feelings of restlessness, anxiety, trembling, startling easily, and difficulty concentrating or sleeping" (p. 1). Excessive arousal might make you furious and impatient, especially if you are sleep deprived. Furthermore, according to McCarty and Gold (1996), "hyperarousal can make victims of past traumatic events more vulnerable to current life stressors through a process called sensitization" (quoted in Kendall-Tackett, 2000, p. 799). Hyperarousal can have an impact on a person's capacity to function with society, including family and friends. He becomes more sensitive, irritable, and has significant mood swings.

1.4. Addictions

As stated by Volpicelli et al (1999, p. 257), readers can obtain a better grasp of the relationship between trauma and addiction:

“An increase in endogenous opioids (endorphins) helps to numb the pain of uncontrollable trauma. However, after a stressful experience, rebound endorphin withdrawal can contribute to the symptoms of mental discomfort as well as an increased desire to drink alcohol. The endorphin compensation theory proposes that people drink alcohol after a stressful experience to compensate for their lack of endorphins.”

In conclusion, alcohol use leads to addiction, in which the survivor consumes more alcohol in order to prevent endorphin withdrawal symptoms (Volpicelli et al, 1999, p.257). Alcohol's sedative effect also permits the sufferer to forget about their experiences.

2. Acting Out and Working Through

"Acting out" and "working through" are two concepts used in psychoanalytic theory to describe different ways in which individuals cope with trauma and emotional distress. "Acting out" refers to a type of defense mechanism in which individuals unconsciously express their repressed emotions and desires through their actions, rather than through more healthy and productive means of communication. This can manifest as impulsive or reckless behavior, substance abuse, or other forms of self-destructive behavior.

"Working through," on the other hand, refers to the process of confronting and processing repressed emotions and traumas in a conscious and deliberate manner. This process involves bringing repressed thoughts and feelings to consciousness and reflecting on them, often with the help of a therapist or trusted friend. The goal of working through is to gain a deeper understanding of one's inner conflicts and to resolve them in a healthy and productive way.

2.1. Acting Out

An intellectual historian and literary theorist Dominick LaCapra (1939) defines "acting out" traumatic memories as the "compulsion of repetition," which is "the tendency to relive the past, to be haunted by ghosts, or even to live in the present as if we were still in the past, without distance from it." LaCapra describes the traumatized person's language as "seeming to repeat what was said before and function as speech acts in which the speech itself is possessed or haunted by the past and acts as a reenactment or acting out." Furthermore, he claims that traumatized individuals can enter a phase of overcoming trauma provided the trauma is not regarded as a "object of fixation" or as a "all-consuming destiny." (Sabah et al., 2020)

Acting out involves a compulsive and repetitive reliving of tragedy. Those who commit crimes have difficulties discriminating between the present and the past, as well as thinking about the future. They are haunted by their past events, which have harmed them. This is unavoidable following trauma. However, traumatized persons must begin to address their traumas in order to navigate their way through the hurdles in their lives and re-engage with life in the present. If they want to progress beyond the weakest symptoms, they must express their trauma. These symptoms include hyper-arousal (living in fight-or-flight mode), intrusion (nightmares and flashbacks), and restriction (avoiding normal social contacts and living a severely constrained life). (Schick, 2011)

LaCapra defines acting out as when a person is haunted or possessed by the past and is constantly repeating a painful scenario, as though reliving the traumatic scene. "Where a person is haunted or possessed by the past and performatively trapped in compulsive repetition of traumatic scenes, as if he or she is going back in time to relive the traumatic scenes" (LaCapra 2001:21). The returning memory is usually a traumatic awakening in the form of nightmares, flashbacks that can lead to anxiety attacks, and other forms of repetitive behaviors that are disturbing (LaCapra, 2001: 89). In brief, it can be understood that the memory returned by the victims of a traumatic event will return in a certain form repeatedly.

There are numerous methods for dealing with traumatic events. One example is nightmares. The recurring flashbacks and nightmares eventually lead the survivor to create an illusory world formed from traumatic memories. Dreams can be interpreted as "unresolved conflicts because, as we have seen, they come to us in disguised form, and we will interpret them only to whatever extent we are ready to do so”(Tyson, 2006). After nightmares, trauma survivors also sometimes experience flashbacks, but as Caruth says that “they are largely inaccessible to conscious recall and control” (Caruth, 1995:151). This proves that the traumatic memory images emerge unconsciously and sometimes cannot be recalled at will by the survivor.

Acting out can also be caused by compulsive behavior, forgetfulness (excessive memory), and nightmares or flashbacks. Hypernemia, which is an exaggerated memory, where one is able to recall the image in detail. This usually occurs during certain periods or events related to the individual's feelings or emotions. (Baihaqi, 2007). Amnesia, on the other hand, is the loss of memory of all or part of the traumatic event, which can also be temporary or permanent due to organic or psychological causes. While organic amnesia is caused by storage damage, psychological amnesia is caused by difficult recall (Baihaqi, 2007). Amnesia can occur due to a lack of need for the individual to remember the event. Trauma victims do not remember anything that has been forgotten or repressed, but they do "act," according to Freud. They reproduce it not as a memory, but as an action; then repeat it, without knowing that they are repeating it.” (Freud, 1920).

2.2. Working Through

In addition to acting out, there is also working through which is the next step after a person has accepted their traumatic memory as part of their past. To overcome trauma, one must first conquer the obstacles that keep them from living, which can only be done through the process of overcoming terrible occurrences. Schick claims that "solving the problem itself is a process that will never fully transcend action... [it] will never be achieved forever." (Schick, 2011)

Working through allows trauma survivors to reconcile with their trauma. Reconciliation can also be said to be an acceptance of all trauma memories. As Pierre Janet illustrates, trauma can be stored in memory and transformed into story memories. (Caruth, 1996).

However, the stage of overcoming trauma can be challenging since the person who has experienced the trauma, as well as those who empathize with them, may reject discussing it because they believe they must continue to believe their experience (LaCapra, 2001). It is important to emphasize, however, that the process of working through begins once one has recovered from the traumatic experience: "One is back there and here at the same time, and one can distinguish (not dichotomize) the two" (LaCapra, 2001).

CHAPTER III

RESEARCH METHOD

A. Research Design

A descriptive qualitative approach was used in this research. A descriptive qualitative, according to Jones and Bartlet, is a research method that analyzes the study object's experience, social processes, and subculture. Furthermore, rather than numerical data, the data will be provided in the form of words and sentences. There were two objects of the study for this study: material object and formal object. The material object of this study is A.J. Finn's novel The Woman in the Window, which was released in 2018. The formal object of this study focused on Trauma Reconciliation of The Main Character portrayed on The Woman In The Window by A.J. Finn.

B. Data Collection Technique

1. Source of Data

The primary and secondary data are the two categories of data used in this study. A.J. Finn's novel with entitled The Woman In The Window (2018) serves as the main source of information for this study. References from the research paper, journals, books, articles, and any other source that could assist this research were used as secondary data sources.

2. Instrument of the Research

The writer utilized note-taking as the instrument to gather data for this study. Using note cards to record the data results from data sources, whether from oral presentations or written sources, is a strategy for compiling the data that is necessary for analysis.

3. Procedure in Collecting Data

The writer used many techniques to gather data, including the following:

- a. The writer read the novel.
- b. The writer identified the trauma experienced and the reconciliation of trauma by the main character in the novel.
- c. The writer analyzed the data. Analyzed data contained trauma experienced and the reconciliation of trauma by the main character in the novel.
- d. The writer made a conclusion and suggestion of this study.

C. Data Analysis Technique

Theory of Trauma by Cathy Caruth to identify and analyze the data specifically the symptoms of the trauma experienced by the main character. Then, the concept of acting out and working through from LaCapra to identified the reconciliation of trauma.

CHAPTER IV

FINDING AND DISCUSSION

Findings and discussion are two different but interconnected parts of this chapter. This research will discuss all the information found from A.J. Finn's The Woman In The Window, which features complex issues and one of the conditions that illustrates the reconciliation of trauma in the main character.

A. Findings

This part consists of findings of the study which contained the data analysis of the trauma and reconciliation of the main character's trauma in The Woman In The Window by A.J. Finn based on Trauma Theory by Cathy Caruth and the concept of Acting Out and Working Through by LaCapra. To help readers comprehend the facts, the writer gives an explanation on a separate page. They are listed below:

1. Trauma Experienced by The Main Character in A.J. Finns' The Woman In The Window

The concept of acting out by LaCapra shows the psychological conditions experienced by survivors as a result of the traumatic event they experienced. Trauma is a psychological injury that is extremely dangerous for the person who suffers from it. This is because trauma can impair individuals' cognitive, emotional, and behavioral abilities. Caruth states that trauma is strongly tied to psyche, mind, and brain traumas generated by personal experiences or events involving time (past), self, and environment. (Caruth, 1996).

Anna Fox, the main character in The Woman In The Window, has a traumatic backstory. The emergence of such trauma can lead to other forms or symptoms of trauma for the survivor. From the trauma experienced, it will usually lead to a traumatic awakening that continues to repetition originating from the traumatic memory that a person has, LaCapra used to use the term acting out for this. He further explained that “This memory may return in the shape of nightmares, flashbacks, anxiety attacks, and other forms of intrusively repetitive behavior” (LaCapra, 2001:89). All the memories that survivors of a traumatic event try to suppress will return in certain forms repeatedly. Similarly, Anna Fox, the main character in The Woman In The Window, suffers from various symptoms as a result of the lasting trauma of earlier events that occurred to her. The following are the symptoms of Anna Fox as narrated in The Woman In The Window.

1.1. Flashbacks

Caruth explains that flashbacks as a form of painful repetition that can only be understood as the mind's absolute inability to avoid unpleasant events that have not been given psychic meaning in any way (1996, 59). This symptom experienced by the main character Anna. It can be seen in the following quotation:

“GRANNYLIZZIE: William calls me every day from Florida. He says HELLO THERE in his biggest voice and I smile. Gets me every time. I smile too.

THE DOCTORISIN: My family always says “Guess who” when I talk to them!

“GRANNYLIZZIE: Oh I like that!

I think of Livvy and Ed, hear their voices in my head. My throat swells.

I swallow some more wine” (Finn, 2018 p. 153)

According to the quote above, Anna has a client who has Post Traumatic Disorder. Anna was drawn to a grandmother whose life mirrored Anna's. During a conversation on the Agora website, the grandmother's words reminded Anna of a habit that her husband and son always have when they talk to her. She remembers the past memory with her husband and Livy who did the same thing to her. The quote above shows that Anna is having a flashback. Instantly the conversation with the grandmother caused Anna to hear the voices of her husband and child inside her head. "My throat swells" indicates that the flashbacks Anna experienced caused her anxiety and fear. It's been ten months since Anna confined herself to her house. However, the memory still continues to haunt Anna in her daily life. Many things can easily trigger Anna to recall the traumatic event. It can be seen also in the following quotation:

“The words hang in the air, float there, like smoke.

Behind Little's shoulders, I see Alistair and Ethan, their eyes wide; I see David, his jaw dropped. Norelli, for some reason, turns her gaze to the floor. “Dr. Fox?”

Little. I bring him into focus, standing across the island from me, his face bathed in full afternoon light.

“Anna,” he says.

I don't move, can't move.”

“He takes a breath, holds it. Expels. “Dr. Fielding told me the story.”

I screw my eyes shut. All I see is darkness. All I hear is Little’s voice.

“He said a state trooper found you at the bottom of a cliff.” Yes.

I remember his voice, that deep cry, rappelling down the face of the mountain.”

“And by that point you’d spent two nights outside. In a snowstorm. In the middle of winter.”

Based on the quote above, Anna had a flashback when Detective Norelli said that "Your husband and daughter are dead". Those words have never been spoken by anyone since the accident happened. She always tries to block that memory. She didn't want to recall the terrible instances that had occurred with her family. Anna wished to erase unpleasant memories in order to preserve her beautiful memories with them alive. However, Detective Norelli pronounced the inevitable fact and certainly broke the magic that Anna had been guarding for the past ten months. Those words made Anna lose control "I closed my eyes tighter and tighter, trying to find a deeper darkness". Anna replayed the dark memory that she always wanted to avoid.

1.2. Hallucinations

Hallucinations are conscious sensory experiences that occur in the absence of external stimulation (Tarigan, 2013). They may have peculiar body sensations, hear sounds, or see sights that regular people do not have. Nervousness, panic, paranoia, and fear can all result from hallucinations. After the traumatic event Anna experienced, Anna continued to hallucinate being able to communicate with her husband who had died in an accident she had with her family. Anna talked to her husband like she used to talk to him when he was alive.

“And then, once more, I talk to Ed.

“Guess who,” I say, the way I always do.

“You’re pretty tipsy, slugger,” he points out.

“Getting ready for tomorrow.”

“A ghost,” Ed says.

“You got lucky.”

“What do you mean?”

I laugh. “Last year she was a fire truck.”

I can hear him grin.”

“I stare at the screen for a moment. A minute later I’m talking to Ed.

No “guess who” this time.”

“I’m not laughing now. I wonder once more if I should talk to Little.

But instead I talk to Ed.”

“So you’re going a little stir-crazy, are you, slugger?”

The above quote shows that Anna heard Ed's voice and had a conversation with him. Whenever Anna needed a distraction from the discomfort she was feeling, she would always bring her husband to escape the uncomfortable feelings she was feeling. Anna spent a lot of time conversing with her husband and children when she was confined to her house. This worried her doctors because Anna Fox enjoyed the conversations she had with her husband.

“.....on my chats with Ed and Olivia (concerned again).

Now I look away once more, unblinking, unthinking, at the books on Ed’s shelves. A history of the Pinkerton detectives. Two volumes on Napoléon. Bay Area Architecture. An eclectic reader, my husband. My estranged husband.”

“It sounds to me as though these conversations are causing you some mixed feelings,” Dr. Fielding says.”

Anna frequently claimed that she did not live with her husband and daughter, despite the fact that she spoke to them virtually every day. They passed away in a car accident while on vacation, and Anna had witnessed their deaths in stages, which made her feel guilty and subsequently unhappy. Anna's melancholy drove her to hallucinate so frequently that she believed she frequently heard the voices of her husband and daughter attempting to speak with her.

“You must miss your family.”

“Yes. Terribly. But I talk to them every day.”

“Guess who,” Ed says.

I shift in my chair. “That’s my line.”

“You sound like hell, slugger.”

“Sound and feel.”

“Are you sick?”

“I was,” I reply. I shouldn’t tell him about last night, I know, but I’m too weak. And I want to be honest with Ed. He deserves that.

He’s displeased. “You can’t do that, Anna. Not on medication.”

“I know.” Already I regret having said anything.

“But really.”

“I know, I said.”

Anna often heard the voices of her husband and daughter when she was lonely without them since she lived alone in a huge house and experienced many of the distractions, restlessness, and anxiety that Anna normally felt. As a result, Anna was overjoyed when she was invited to communicate with them. It may be argued that her husband and daughter were always present to assist or simply tell Anna about her day, and they continually cautioned her that drinking alcohol could disrupt her thoughts or make things worse. Anna enjoyed conversing with her husband and daughter, but in reality it was a common hallucination in which she was constantly conversing with herself.

“How can I explain? To anyone—to Little or Norelli, or to Alistair or Ethan, or to David, or even to Jane? I hear them; their voices echo inside me, outside me. I hear them when I'm overwhelmed by the pain of their absence, their loss—I can say it: their deaths. I hear them when I need someone to talk to. I hear them when I least expect it. “Guess who,” they’ll say, and I beam, and my heart sings. And I respond.”

The sentence above shows that Anna listened to the conversations just to alleviate her longing for her husband and her daughter. Anna heard them; their voices echoed within her. When Anna was overcome by the agony of their absence, she heard them. When Anna needed someone to talk to, she heard them. Anna was irritated by the voices she often heard. She had not anticipated them. Nonetheless, it tormented her every day and every lonely night she spent at home.

“Guess who?”

I shake my head. I don’t want to talk to Ed right now.

“How you feeling, slugger?”

But I shake my head again. I can’t speak, won’t speak.

“Mom?”

No.

“Mommy?”

I flinch.

No.”

The quote above shows that Anna is trying to ignore the voices that keep echoing in her head. She forces herself not to talk to Ed and Olivia. Even if Anna didn't want them to, the sounds continued to resonate inside her thoughts. This made

Anna, continue to doubt that she had seen the murder at her neighbor's house. This is because Anna continues to hallucinate by having conversations with her husband and children as if they are still living with her in the house.

1.3. Agoraphobia

Agoraphobia is a type of anxiety condition in which you are terrified of and avoid locations or situations that make you feel confined, helpless, or embarrassed. Westphal, a neurologist and psychiatrist, invented the term agoraphobia in 1871. People who suffer from agoraphobia are afraid of current or future scenarios, such as taking public transportation, being in open or closed environments, standing in line, or being in huge crowds (APA 2000). Those suffering from agoraphobia frequently struggle to feel comfortable in public spaces, particularly in crowded areas. When you are out in public, you may feel the need to be accompanied by someone, such as a friend or relative. You may be so frightened that you can't get out of your house. When Anna's character sits at her desk and starts talking to herself, she exhibits this symptom.

“I UPEND the hourglass on my desk, watch how the little pyramid of sand seems to pulse as the grains dimple it. So much time, nearly a year. I haven't left the house in almost a year.”

As shown in the quote, when Anna lost the ability to go outside, she started the process of acting out, which is the first idea in trauma theory. Caruth defines acting out as a repeating retelling of painful occurrences. Anna is seen to experience reoccurring nightmares about unpleasant occurrences in her past. The dark depths she notices are one of the primary consequences of severe trauma. This is consistent with LaCapra's (1994) theory that traumatic events are suppressed before they plague a person in obsessive repetition.

As this sentence shows, Anna has never left her home for more than a year. Although it's not easy for ordinary people, the fear of leaving home is normal. Whenever Anna tried to leave the house, she would feel sudden panic and anxiety. Due to her dread of open places, Anna spent her life within the house, working from home and connecting to the outside world only through her internet network, thus for ten months she isolated herself to the house and never stepped out to engage with the outside world. Jane Russell helps Anna when she faints in front of her house, indicating that she is unable to leave.

Jane Russell : "But I thought agoraphobia means you just can't, you know, go camping. Outdoorsy stuff."

Anna Fox : "I can't go anywhere."

Jane sucks her teeth.

Jane Russell : "How long has this been going on?"

I drain the last drops of brandy.

Anna Fox : "Ten months."

She doesn't pursue it. I breathe deeply, cough.

In the dialog excerpt above, Anna explains to Jane Russell that her condition is more than just her inability to undertake certain activities outside the house. However, Anna explained that she had nowhere to go but inside the house she was currently living in. She had been confined to her house for ten months.

“That’s when your troubles started. Your problems going outside. Post-traumatic stress. Which I—I mean, I can’t imagine.”

God, how I cowered beneath the hospital fluorescents; how I panicked in the squad car. How I collapsed, those first times leaving the house, once and twice and twice more, until at last I dragged myself back inside.

And locked my doors.

And shut my windows.

And swore I’d keep myself hidden”

Anna's agoraphobia was brought on by an accident with her family. At that time, she spent two nights in the wilderness watching her husband and daughter die. So, she decided to lock herself in the house on the grounds that only in the house did she feel safe because she was familiar with the boundaries of her home.

1.4. Denial

Death is a necessary part of life. Although everyone believes that they will die at some point, death affects each person differently. The way in which death happens has a significant impact on a person's reaction to death. Many other experts, however, have found that the sort of death influences one's experience or reaction to sadness (Silverman, Range, & Overholzer, 1995).

The most difficult mental health problem that frequently happens is grief following the death of someone or something cherished. According to study (Fiedman & Kilpatrick, 2013), the loss of a loved one can be a traumatic experience, especially if it is unintentional. In truth, many people feel terrible if their acts or words result in the death of another person.

Anna Fox experienced the same thing. In order to cope with her grief, she denied the deaths of her husband and daughter. As a result, she subconsciously disregarded the unsettling fact that they were killed in an accident.

“Home school,” he says. “My mom teaches me.” Before I can respond, he nods at a picture on a side table. “Is that your family?”

“Yes. That’s my husband and my daughter. He’s Ed and she’s Olivia.”

“Are they home?”

“No, they don’t live here. We’re separated.”

According to the quote above, Anna is in denial over the deaths of her husband and daughter. When Ethan asked where her husband and daughter were, Anna replied that she no longer lived with them. However, they had been living separately. Not once did Anna deny the fact that her husband and daughter were dead. She always has the same answer when anyone asks about the whereabouts of her husband and daughter. This can also be seen from the following quote:

“I understand your family doesn’t live here, ma’am?” Norelli says.

“Is that a question?”

“That’s a question.”

Alistair: “My son says you’re divorced.”

“Separated,” I correct him, automatically”

The quote above also shows that Anna never told anyone that her husband and daughter had died. She always answers with the word "Separated". This shows that Anna has not been able to accept the fact that her family is gone. Anna continues to believe that they are still alive, it's just that she and her family live in a separate place from her. Anna's condition of rejecting this reality illustrates her very sad life. Anna does this as a self-defense mechanism from all the pain she feels.

“I squeeze my eyes tighter, straining for more dark. They aren’t—you know, hallucinations, I’d told him; I just like pretending they’re here every now and then. As a coping mechanism. I know that too much contact isn’t healthy.”

Based on the quote above, it describes how miserable Anna's condition is. While confined to the house, she cured her sadness and loneliness by enjoying conversations with her husband and daughter. The conversations she used to have on a daily basis with her family. Anna realized that the conversations she had been having with her husband and daughter were not a hallucination, but a self-defense mechanism she used to avoid the traumatic memories she had experienced with her family. Denial is a way for Anna to put distance between her and an overwhelming experience. Then with the reality that she cannot accept, she imagines by having a conversation with her family.

1.5. Feel of Guilty

Trauma-related guilt is an uncomfortable feeling of regret caused by the thought that you could or should have done something differently at the time of a traumatic incident. Trauma survivors may also develop survivor guilt, a sort of trauma-related guilt. Survivor guilt is frequently felt when one individual survives a tragic event but others do not. A person may wonder how they survived. They may even blame themselves for surviving a horrible situation, as if they were at fault.

The experience of trauma-related guilt does not appear to be affected by the type of traumatic incident. Combat exposure, physical violence, sexual abuse, and the loss of a loved one have all been linked to feelings of trauma-related guilt. As experienced by Anna Fox in the quote below:

“I keep . . .” I begin, the words forming in my mouth unbidden. Can I go here again? I can; I do. “I keep thinking—I can’t stop thinking—about the trip. I hate that it was my idea.”

Nothing from across the room, even though—or perhaps because—he knows this, knows all of it, has heard it over and over. And over. “I keep wishing it wasn’t. Weren’t.

I keep wishing it had been Ed’s idea. Or no one’s. That we’d never gone.” I knot my fingers. “Obviously.”

Gently: “But you did go.”

I feel singed.

“You arranged a family vacation. No one should feel ashamed of that.”

“Many people go to New England in winter.”

“It was stupid.”

“It was thoughtful.”

"It was incredibly stupid," I insist.

Dr. Fielding doesn't respond. The central heating clears its throat, exhales.

"If I hadn't done it, we'd still be together."

He shrugs. "Maybe."

"Definitely."

The above quote shows Anna Fox's regret and guilt for planning a vacation with her husband and child. She wishes that if she had not planned the vacation then the accident would never have happened and her husband and son would still be with her today. The guilt also persisted because the accident only managed to save her life. She lost her husband and child.

1.6. Death Drive

The death wish is basically a death instinct where a person longs or desires to die. It can result from one's freedom being hindered by having to take care of people, or one's freedom from pain. In this state, a person subconsciously wants to be free from the burden or pain they feel. This was also the case with Anna, who developed a feeling of wanting to die or a weak sense of desire to live. If observed from the perspective of trauma studies, when the subject cannot control fear and trauma, the final solution is death. In line with what LaCapra said that "incisively describe the proses as assort ritualizing of repetition compulsion turned against the death drive" (2001: 187).

Tubes and canisters and pots of pills crowd the medicine cabinet. I remove four.

I walk downstairs, the skylight shedding gray evening light overhead.

Sitting on the sofa, I select a canister, tip it over, drag it across the coffee table. A trail of pills follows it like bread crumbs.

I study them. Count them. Brush them into my cupped hand. Scatter them upon the tabletop.

Bring one to my lips.

No—not yet.

The preceding sentence demonstrates Anna's intention to die. She's resolved to finish all of the medicines she's been taking to keep herself sane. She had lost her passion for life after all she had been through. She doubts herself and feels there is no reason for her to continue living.

“You don’t even wanna live anymore! You haven’t wanted to live for a long time! [gasping] [breathing heavily] Here we go!”

The dialogue above occurs when Anna is fighting with Ethan where Anna tries to escape from Ethan who intends to kill her. Where when Ethan tried to kill Anna by putting Anna's face in a puddle of water. Ethan said that Anna had no desire to live anymore, this was because Ethan knew the video of Anna's last words. This happened due to Anna's death wish as she felt very tired and frustrated with everything that was happening in her life.

“And I am, uh, making this video...

As my final will and testament.

[camera beeps]

The point of me doing this is that there's no, um...

Confusion...

About, um, my soundness of mind.

My state of mind.

I... I... I especially wanna make sure that, um...

That you know that David Winters has absolutely nothing to do with my death.

In fact, I'm waiting for him to come...

To come and to get his stuff...

So that I can, um...

Go through with it.

Go through with it... [scoffs]

I just wish I could be forgiven.

I really...

Wish I could just be forgiven.

I want to go back.

I want to do it over.

I want to do it different.

And I can't."

The quote above is evidence of the death instinct that occurred in Anna when she recorded a video of her last words before she planned to kill herself. Where the actions she took were due to frustration and depression regarding anxiety disorders, and guilt within herself.

1.7. Uncontrolled Anger

Uncontrolled anger is a common occurrence for every individuals; without a doubt, uncontrolled anger destroys relationships and lives. Subdued discontent, on the other hand, can be truly taxing and sometimes hazardous when it can no longer be contained. Anna experienced the same incident on Halloween, when she meant to relax by watching a movie. She became mad, however, when she heard three tiny children pelting her house with eggs. Anna was unable to leave the house. All she could do was curse and knock on the windows.

“A crack, and the window shudders. A tiny missile has struck: an egg, blasted, its guts spangled across the glass. I hear myself gasp. Through the smear of yolk I can see three kids in the street” (Finns, 2018, p. 50).

“This is my home. That’s my window.

My throat shrinks. Tears well in my eyes. I feel surprised, then ashamed. Whap.

Then angry.

I can’t fling wide the door and send them scurrying. I can’t barrel outside and confront them. I rap on the window, sharply” (Finns, 2018, p. 51).

The uncontrollable anger caused by a boy led to a panic attack in Anna.

However, she has no other choice but to curse the boy from inside the house by knocking loudly on the window, an act that is not at all frightening and may not make sense to the boy outside her house. Uncontrolled anger is a symptom of trauma that frequently manifests itself in a person when prompted by something minor or a problem that they are unable to handle. Anna couldn't handle the children on her own, but she was at home by herself. The trigger eventually appears to Anna and entirely possesses her, making her angry and scared.

Anna was furious and didn't know what else to do. When her efforts were unsuccessful, she decided to run away from home and leave the children behind. As her vision began to blur, she walked towards the door of her hallway and prepared to vent her frustration on the children. When the door opened, she lost consciousness and fell faint.

"Anger grips me by the throat; my sight is swimming. I seize a breath, seize another.

In-two-three—

I jolt the door open. Light and air blast me.

For an instant it's silent, as silent as the film, as slow as the sunset. The houses opposite. The three kids between. The street around them. Quiet and still, a stopped clock.

I could swear I hear a crack, as of a felled tree."

(Finns, 2018, p. 52).

Uncontrollable anger often occurs when a person is unable to contain their emotions, as seen in Anna, who is recalling the incident in which she saw Jane's chest pierced by a knife. Because David was working at Jane's house that day, Anna was curious and planned to ask her basement tenant. She couldn't wait to check out Jane's health from David, so she went downstairs. Anna went into the basement without permission to look for David since she thought it was her house and she could do whatever she wanted.

“It’s wrong, I know, but this is my house. And it’s urgent. It’s very urgent. I move to the desk in the living room, slide open the drawer, and find it there, dull silver and jagged with teeth: the key.”

(Finns, 2018, p. 210).

Everyone was against Anna since she was accused of hallucinating the day Jane was stabbed in the chest with a knife. Anna reported the event and made a hasty decision that exacerbated the situation. Anna reasoned that David, her basement tenant who worked for Jane's husband, might know what was going on, so she went down there when she shouldn't have. However, she was unable to manage her emotions at the time and had to refrain from acting without David's permission.

Several detectives arrived at Anna's house, informing her that she had witnessed her neighbor being stabbed in her house. Anna was visibly upset. Anna became frightened after getting an email from an unknown source showing a photo of herself sleeping taken at two a.m. She contacted the investigating detective again to check on and request help at her home when someone broke in. Anna continued to explain all that had occurred. She started with the email she got, containing a picture of herself asleep. Then she received confirmation that she remembered Jane arriving at her house, along with a picture of Anna's face with the sunset in the lower right corner. However, what Anna says is interpreted as an illusion and a manifestation of her loneliness. It began with her email, in which she took a photo at night with her eyes closed to appear sleepy, and then the image she drew of herself was not of Jane, as she took a selfie and emailed it to herself. Anna feels angry by what the detective says.

“I’m not the one wasting time,” I growl. “You are. You are. Someone was in my house, and I’ve given you proof, and you’re standing there telling me that I made it up. Just like last time. I saw someone get stabbed and you didn’t believe me. What do I have to do to get you—”
Finns, 2018, p. 310).

Anna gets angry and yelling in the statement above because she cannot tolerate all of the insults directed to her. Anna presented evidence, but it was all discarded as faked by her. Starting with the moment Anna saw Jane being stabbed being a hallucination because Anna was under the influence and watching a thriller film that caused her to have hallucinations that did not occur, the email including a photo while she was sleeping was considered a selfie. It didn't help that they weren't evidence and made Anna furious to the point of yelling. Anna's situation is getting worse as she is surrounded by everyone involved in her case, from the investigators to her neighbors, who believe she is insane.

1.8. Self-Destructive

People who are self-destructive only harm themselves, this happens when they feel very stuck to manage stress or life pressure. A person who self-destructs by self-harming has various reasons such as, to escape from pain, to express anger towards oneself, to feel alive, to suppress or numb emotions, and to gain control. One of the causes or factors of self-destruction can also be caused by trauma, which is an unwanted experience such as family problems or interpersonal conflicts. This is also what happened to Anna when she was unable to withstand the anxiety and stress she felt. Anna Fox's trauma causes her to become addicted. Anna's behavior of always consuming alcohol unwittingly creates a death instinct in her by damaging her body's health.

“Imipramine. Tofranil. For depression. Also bed-wetting.”

“You’re a bed wetter?”

“Tonight I might be.” I sip my wine.

“And that one?”

“Temazepam. Sleeping pill. That’s for later.”

She nods. “Are you supposed to be taking any of these with alcohol?”

I swallow. “Nope.”

It’s only as the pills squeeze down my throat that I remember I already took them this morning.

In the quote above shows that Anna Fox has an addiction to alcohol. Analyzing Anna's drinking habits, which were becoming increasingly risky for her.

Anna was unconcerned about her health and had a history of using drugs and alcohol. Anna was constantly forgetting to take her medication, skipping days, taking too much, or mixing it with alcohol, which might result in an overdose. She continues to do so despite the fact that she is endangering her health and risking overdosing. She treats her body and intellect as if they are insignificant. Anna is unconcerned about herself and refuses to change. She is aware that her activities could lead to a dangerous life, but she continues to do so.

Three bottles of wine—or was it four? Even so, I can stomach more, have stomached more. “The pills,” I say, the way a detective cries “Eureka!”—my dosage. I double-dosed yesterday, I remember. Must be the pills. “I bet those’ll knock you on your behind,” Jane giggled after I’d downed the lot, chased them with a slug of wine.

The above quote proves Anna's self-destructive behavior. Anna says that she can down four or more bottles of wine. She also takes double doses of medication, accompanied by alcohol of course. The doses she swallows can cause a person to lose consciousness. However, Anna ignored that fact. This behavior shows that Anna has a passion to end her life by drinking alcohol that will eventually damage her body.

In the kitchen, I chase the pills with merlot. I understand Dr. Fielding’s concern, I do; I recognize that alcohol is a depressant, and as such, ill-suited to a depressive. I get it.

Anna was often warned by her doctor not to take her prescribed medication with alcohol. Anna had been warned that the anti-depressant medication she was taking should not be taken with alcohol as it would cause very bad side effects. However, Anna always ignored this. She continued to take alcohol with her medication.

2. Reconciliation the Main Character's Trauma in A.J. Finns' The Woman In The Window

Reconciliation is a step toward healing from past trauma. LaCapra will focus on the concept of working through in this segment, which is the phase of dealing with trauma or problems in stages. The aspect of working through is when one is able to be in the present and the past simultaneously without dichotomising the two, as LaCapra (2014, 90) said : ... as an aspect of working through the past, one is both back there and here at the same time, and one is able to distinguish between (not dichotomize) the two. This aspect is characterized by a person or subject being able to testify about the traumatic experience felt. In addition, the subjects were also able to start a new life, even though the dark shadow of the past adorned their days. Anna Fox in The Woman in the Window is traumatized by the accident that killed her husband and daughter, but on the other hand she tries to reconcile, even though traumatic shadows still come to haunt her life. The following is a description of Anna Fox's reconciliation efforts: Anna Fox's behavior in the story indicates her struggle to deal with his past, from which he makes some significant recovery. LaCapra reasoned that:

“In the working through, the person tries to gain critical distance on a problem, to be able to distinguish between past, present and future. For the victim, this means his ability to say to himself, “Yes, that happened to me back then. It was distressing, overwhelming, perhaps I can’t entirely disengage myself from it, but I’m existing here and now, and this is different from back then.” There may be other possibilities, but it’s via the working-through that one acquires the possibility of being an ethical agent.”

(LaCapra, 1998, pp.2-3)

For Anna, this year has been challenging. Anna managed to go past all the trauma she had endured despite the increasing difficulties she faced. Anna began by forcing herself to engage with the outside world despite her fear and anxiety over what had previously occurred to her when engaging with things outside of her home. Anna was extremely frightened when meeting new people; she was worried that no one would accompany her; she was worried that the light streaming in through the windows would make her feel watched; and she was so afraid of what was beyond her house that she fainted when she was out in public.

“Of course, it was only three days ago that I acted—acted in this very same way—and I wound up in a hospital bed. To try that again is insane. Either way, I’m crazy. Fine. I need to know. And I’m no longer sure my house is safe.” (Finns, 2018, p. 259).

“I’ve waited to rejoin the world. Now is the time.” (Finns, 2018, p. 439).

"I close my eyes.

And I open them.

And I step into the light." (Finns, 2018, p. 440).

By embracing and re-entering the outside world, Anna starts to overcome her dread of it. She makes an effort to interact with the outside world by opening windows. Anna attempted to accept what she had always feared and dared to leave home in the same way, despite the fact that it was an insane move. She does all of this to accept and control the trauma within her.

Anna turned her life around by attempting to reconcile all of the challenges she had faced for nearly a year. Anna felt bad about her vacation decision, which resulted in the deaths of her family. She believed she had saved someone who had been stabbed in her home, and she frequently hallucinated talking to herself since she only cared about her husband and children, who were always contacting her.

"I've been resisting Ed and Livvy. Not all the time, not fully; some nights, when I hear them, I murmur back. But the conversations are over." (Finns, 2018, p. 438).

"Nothing—not anymore. I've waited for my family to return; they won't. I've waited for my depression to lift; it wouldn't, not without my help." (Finns, 2018, p. 439).

"She's right: I did this on a roof in the rain. I was fighting for my life. So I must not want to die. And if I don't want to die, I've got to start living." (Finns, 2018, p. 439-440).

According to the statement, in addition to attempting to be better and more self-assured, Anna has accepted reality and herself. Because she was aware that taking a winter vacation was usually linked to her late husband and daughter, Anna always felt bad about doing so. Anna tries to resist and end the conversation, believing that her own encourage will help things improve.

Anna determined to change what had transpired so far in order to leave her current position for the better after an accident that left her terrified of open places and unable to leave the house. Anna had avoided social engagement for ten months and felt safe at home. She enjoyed being alone and preferred dark areas. Anna was also perplexed by how people perceived her, and when she sought to flee the house and meet Jane at the coffee shop, she encountered an environment she hadn't felt in a long time. Anna has a hard time getting along with others, so she's at a loss on what to do. She only communicates via the internet or online, and she is unconcerned about her appearance.

“And so am I. The past six weeks have stabilized me, clarified me. The skylight’s repaired, for one thing. A professional cleaner swung by, spitpolished the house. And I’m dosing properly, drinking less. Drinking not at all, in fact, thanks in part to a tattooed miracle worker named Pam. “I’ve dealt with all kinds of people, in all kinds of situations,” she told me on her first visit.” (Finns, 2018, p. 437)

Anna works hard to avoid the stigma of being a crazy woman and an alcoholic. Anna didn't want to stay at home all day; she wanted to chat to someone who could help her feel more at ease than she was. Anna begins to improve everything, from removing her fear of the outside world to upgrading her home to make it more colorful.

Anna is attempting to return to assisting patients or what she refers to as her online family in Agora, and she is also ready to leave the house with a positive outlook. When Anna was getting ready to leave the house with Dr. Fielding, she experienced a panic attack, which caused her to faint. Anna is concerned about the amount of sunshine entering her home, is sensitive while discussing the outside world, and wishes to tell the truth. She is also terrified of snow and refuses to experience it because the last time she did was after an incident that triggered severe depression.

“And a few weeks ago I rejoined the Agora. They’re my tribe; they’re a sort of family. I will promote healing and well-being.” (Finns, 2018, p. 437).

“Now, when the sun is blasting my house. Now, when I’m clearheaded, clear-eyed. Now, as Bina leads me to the door, to the top of the stairs.” (Finns, 2018, p. 439).

Anna is becoming more motivated with the adjustments she is making to improve her life, and her return to the Agora site makes her feel more helpful. Anna feels more useful in assisting anyone who suffers from a fear of wide spaces and crowded locations, including herself. Anna was ready to accept her new surroundings and continued to exercise self-strengthening while dealing with anxiety panic attacks in public. She also resolved to accept everything that had occurred and to mend the errors she had made in order to get in better shape. She is also eager to battle to solve any problems that arise, because Anna's method is always the most effective.

The statement demonstrates that Anna has now accepted her loss and is ready to conquer her anguish, fear, and unhappiness while leaving her traumatic past behind. Anna's acts were interpreted as a means of overcoming her trauma by confronting her pain and letting go of her past. According to LaCapra (1994), "trauma and the insistence that there is no alternative to the presenting symptoms and the compulsion of repetition other than the imaginary... the hope of totalization, full closure, and redemptive meaning". She suffered untold pain as a result of the catastrophe, lost comfort and security, altered herself, and left scars that could not be healed. Some people may never be able to transcend their trauma and will be haunted by it for the rest of their lives. This is a difficult and painful work to complete, and not everyone can overcome their trauma, thus they cannot. (Schick, 2011)

B. Discussions

This study has been divided into three sections. First, it examines the novel's main character's trauma symptoms and through the perspectives of Cathy Caruth and the concept of Dominick LaCapra. Second, it discusses how the main character copes with her trauma. Third, talk about the way the novel narrates the trauma.

This section of the discussion centers on certain data from the study that were discovered in the preceding section. Based on the findings above, this study revealed that there are eight symptoms of trauma experienced by the main character in this novel. These symptoms are divided into four parts, namely intrusions, avoidance, hyperarousal, and addictions. In the novel, it is also found that the main character reconciles the trauma experienced.

A.J. Finn's The Woman In The Window narrates tragic events and traumatic situations. The main character in the novel is traumatized. The main character exhibits symptoms of trauma such as irritability, depression, and hallucinations after experiencing a traumatic event. Caruth (1995) states that trauma victims can show various reactions to traumatic events, such as having intrusive thoughts, avoidance, hyper-arousal, negative cognitions and feelings. Those who experience trauma experience feelings of hopelessness, anxiety, sadness and distress. In addition, traumatic responses can include feelings such as shame, doubt and guilt. They can also shatter important beliefs in one's safety or their view of themselves as worthy, strong and autonomous individuals (Vickroy, 2014).

A.J. Finn's novel The Woman In The Window is built in the traumatic discourse. This novel tells the story of a woman, Anna Fox, who has trauma after witnessing a car accident that causes death of her husband and daughter. This results in trauma that makes her a different person. While her trauma develops with the traumatized character, the way she sees herself, her existence, and her overall thinking changes. This deeply disturbed her psyche. According to Lifton, facing death can cause psychological distress as it forces people to rethink their ultimate purpose in life (Lifton, 1995: 131). Here are some of the symptoms experienced by the main character in the novel:

Victims of trauma may experience traumatic events that they have re-experienced, such as hallucinations, flashbacks, or dreams. Disturbing thoughts continue to haunt the victim and may reappear in the form of flashbacks. When she encounters situations or has conversations related to the traumatic event, the event always looms over her life, as if she is experiencing it again. In addition, Anna Fox experienced flashbacks as a result of a conversation she had with one of her online acquaintances who consulted Anna through an app. Anna Fox has been traumatized since the tragic event, experiencing intense feelings of fear but also feelings of excitement whenever she has interactions with people on the app who have the same issues as her. She reacts to her trauma by having flashbacks every time she hears stories from others on the app, as if she is reliving the terrible event.

Avoidance is another stressful behavior that most trauma victims exhibit. People who have been traumatized may avoid anything that reminds them of the painful experience. They may avoid thinking about, remembering, or discussing their unpleasant experience. Being silent, denial, shutting down, or avoiding social situations are frequent responses for trauma victims. The main character often hallucinates by communicating with her dead husband and daughter. The way she communicates with them is by using the telephone. Her hallucinations are related to her denial that her husband and daughter are dead. She does this as a form of self-defense mechanism. In this novel, it is narrated that Anna Fox always denies the fact of the death of her husband and daughter. She does this by hallucinating having conversations with her husband and daughter, either over the phone or talking to herself as if her husband and daughter are with her. Denial is also practiced when someone asks the whereabouts of her husband and daughter, she always claims that she and her family are separated. Just like when the tenants of her basement and Ethan, her neighbor's son, asked about the whereabouts of her husband and daughter, Anna Fox replied that she had separated from her husband and daughter.

A traumatized person often avoids situations or places that will remind them of the traumatic event they experienced. The novel also narrates that Anna Fox has a phobia or great fear of the outside world. After the traumatic event she experienced, Anna Fox locked herself in her house for almost a year. The main character is afraid of everything related to the world. This was because her accident left her in a place where she could not do anything to save the lives of her husband and daughter. Therefore, she decides to confine herself to her house because she feels that she has full control or power in her own home. The main character was so frightened that she fainted. This fainting is one of the physiological signs that someone is afraid. The feeling of fear is shown by the main character's strong desire to stay in her house without feeling the need to socialize with others.

Hyperarousal is another symptom that Anna Fox identified as a response to trauma. This is a strong negative reaction to something produced by the victim's inability to cope with depression and overwhelming feelings created by the traumatic incident, such as being quick to rage, irritable, acting recklessly, or self-destructively (American Psychiatric Association). Unpleasant events made Anna Fox exceedingly angry and impatient. The novel tells us that Anna cannot control her anger, especially when it comes to the death of her husband and daughter. Guilty feeling continues to haunt the main character in this novel. She continues to blame herself for the death of her husband and daughter. If she had not planned a holiday with her husband and daughter, a different scenario would have happened. These feelings of guilt often lead the main character to hurt herself or do things that harm herself, such as taking drugs with alcohol, forgetting to take her medication or taking more than the prescribed dose. These behaviours lead to the death-drive. Where the main character feels guilty because she is one of the only survivors of the events she has experienced, she has the instinct to die so that she can be reunited with her husband and daughter.

Reconciliation efforts are a step towards making peace with past trauma. In this section we will focus on LaCapra's concept of working through, which is a step towards dealing with trauma or issues in a step-by-step manner. The aspect of working through is when a person is able to be in the present and the past at the same time without dichotomizing the two, as LaCapra said (2014, 90) ... as an aspect of working through the past, one is both back there and here at the same time, and one is able to distinguish between (not dichotomize) the two. This aspect is characterized by the ability of a person or subject to testify to their traumatic experiences. Anna Fox can deal with her trauma after a murder that almost killed her. In the novel, Anna Fox was almost murdered by her neighbor's son Ethan. After the incident, she realized that she actually had no desire to end her life. This is evidenced by Anna's attempt to save herself from someone who wanted to kill her. During this time, she was so shrouded in guilt that she committed self-destruction. Therefore, Anna begins to reconcile with her trauma by trying to move out of her home. After almost a year of confining herself to the house, Anna decided to go out and see the world and socialize with others. In addition, Anna also tried to ignore the figure of her husband and daughter who she knew was just an illusion. And finally, Anna started to work again and live her life as it was before the traumatic event happened to her. In addition, the main character is able to start a new life, even though the dark shadow of the past marks his or her days.

Character and characterization are important factors in a literary work, especially in a novel. (Nurgiyantoro: 164). The characters in a story become the beginning of a story to be able to bring up the reader's emotions when understanding the characters and characterizations in each story. Finn in The Woman In The Window narrates the traumatic experiences and wounds of the main character through characterization in the form of analytic method and dramatic method.

This novel portrays the main character traumatic experiences through a various technique of characterization. In this novel, direct depiction technique is used to describe the psychological trauma experienced by the main character. This method is also used by the author to explain the consequences of the traumatic events experienced by Anna. The novel narrates that Anna experiences agoraphobia which makes her afraid to leave her house. Also, the novel narrates the trauma experienced by the main character using the technique of describing the character's feelings. The technique describes Anna Fox's character through her feelings, which are depicted in the way the story is told. The character's thoughts technique describes Anna Fox's thoughts in dealing with the trauma she experienced. The technique of the views of other characters is also commonly found to describe Anna

Fox's character and trauma. Other characters are David, Ethan, Detective Little who help describe Anna Fox's character. The conversation technique also makes the reader know the character and trauma experienced by Anna Fox. The stream of consciousness technique and the character action technique complement the reader to know Anna Fox's trauma.

In literature, all human phenomena are reflected by literary works and related to the world through simple artistic mediums. It is no doubt that trauma exists as part of human challenges since the start of human history. Through literature, the traumatized can communicate their profound suffering. Literature, in other words, plays the role of the alternative instrument to read the wound and listen to the trauma. Buskova (2013) argued that narrative expression can alleviate the suffering of the traumatized by reconstructing the autobiographical memory which brings immediate relief to the traumatized.

It is widely assumed that trauma theory is a synthesis of psychological and humanistic disciplines. The notion is particularly ingrained in the study of the numerous dimensions of a character's psyche in literature. According to Susannah Radstone et al., "trauma theory denotes a vibrant, interdisciplinary area of Western scholarship that has developed since the 1980s through cross-fertilization between psychology and the humanities" (Radstone 1). Some tales with traumatic themes, moods, and tones are prominent in literary studies for keeping a psychological wound alive while also telling others about the pains of a terrible experience. Another important goal of trauma narratives is to rebuild cultural memory through individual viewpoints, adopting testimonial characteristics to avoid and bear witness to such recurring traumas.

Several studies have been conducted on trauma narrated in novels. Memory, Trauma and the Process of Reconciliation in Paula Hawkins' The Girl on the Train by Zumrotun Lutfiah (2022) is a study that also uses the theory of trauma by Cathy Caruth. This study explains that memory plays an important role in the occurrence of trauma. The characters in the novel are trapped in the process of acting out the impact of a trauma in the form of repetition of traumatic events experienced, but in the end the characters in the novel succeed in carrying out a reconciliation with the past through a desire to be free from trauma and the past followed by self-awakening from trauma which then continues with testimony and the role of listeners who are part of the form of working through for people who are victims of past events. Another research about trauma is a research by Endang Sartika (2020) entitled Traumatic Experiences in Eka Kurniawan's Novel Seperti Dendam, Rindu Harus Dibayar Tuntas. The novel shows that the sociocultural environment can become the greatest source of trauma as well as offer the healing process for the traumatized through compassion and understanding. The characters' traumatic experience is narrated by the unknown godlike narrator. Through the portrayal of the characters, Kurniawan reveals how pain, suffering, and traumatic experiences lead the characters to gain high self-esteem, self-knowledge, and philosophical understanding of social reality. The last, compared with the previous study, a research by Arofah and Muh. Arif Rokhman (2020) entitled Memori, Trauma, Dan Upaya Rekonsiliasi Perang Teluk II Dalam Novel Sā'atu Bagdād Karya Syahad Al-Rāwiy. The results of this study indicate that the incident of Gulf War II is a personal traumatic memory that becomes the collective memory of the Iraqi people. Traumatic memories are narrated as a cause of trauma. The overlapping event caused the subject to experience back trauma, such as flashbacks, war phobia, and diaspora simulations. As for reducing the memory and trauma that continues to rage, the subject does the working through in two ways: first, efforts to distance and let go of the past through diasporic experience and synchronizing with the new world, and second, to testify by writing novels and finding the right partner.

The Woman in the Window by A.J. Finn is a literary work that focuses on the topic of mental illness as its main theme. The public was obsessed with romanticizing mental illness at the year the novel was published. Because mental health issues were still considered taboo, they were rarely discussed. However, around that time, people began to come up and discuss their mental health issues. In 2018, a trend occurred in which society romanticized the topic of mental illness. This is bolstered by the rise of social media as a venue for romanticizing and celebrating mental illness. In line with this, literary works, according to Swingewood, are socio-cultural documents that can be utilized to observe a phenomenon in society at the moment. This is therefore referred to as literary documentation, which alludes to the era's reflection. Swingewood (Wahyudi, 2013) proposes three concepts in his approach to literature in regard to literature and society: literature as a reflection of the times, literature as a mirror of the author's social status, and literature in relation to history.

A.J. Finn's novel The Woman in the Window reflects the trend of romanticizing mental illness in the year of its release. The novel also explores the story of Anna Fox's mental condition and how others disbelieve her about the facts she wants to convey because of it. The author's descriptions are based on societal occurrences, such as how the topic of mental health is taboo since persons with mental illnesses are still underestimated and frequently questioned in society. Swingewood has a large 'collection' of views that literary works are not artifacts, but the result of a dialectical thought process. As a result, the author has a lot of room to experiment with his sensitivity to his feelings and experiences through his works. However, literary works in this perspective are not just a straight reflection of societal reality.

In this novel, the author said that he described the main character in this novel based on his own experiences. In an interview on "Thrill Seekers," an online radio show, author Alex Dolan asked A.J. Finn about the novel's Harlem setting. A.J. Finn said that, when describing Anna's house, what she remembered was her family friend's house downtown, who she had lived with when she was an intern in New York. He said that he once accidentally locked himself in the ground floor bathroom of a house. When she was finally rescued by her host, she had been trapped "for twenty-two hours and ten minutes." That contributed to her interest in agoraphobia. This contributed to his interest in agoraphobia. A.J. Finn also describes the symptoms of trauma experienced by the protagonist based on her own experiences. A.J. Finn said that he suffered from Bipolar Disorder which caused him to experience severe depression, delusional thoughts, morbid obsessions, and memory problems.

The production of this novel experienced a lot of controversy due to its author. The author of this novel committed many lies to gain attention in society in order to boost his success in releasing The Woman In The Window. In an article released by The New Yorker entitled A Suspense Novelist's Trail of Deceptions, it was said that A.J. Finn had a history of deception, and deceived people with false stories about illness and death. Long before he wrote fiction professionally, Mallory had been experimenting with gothic personal fiction, which seemed designed to attract attention, to get him ahead, or to explain failure. Money and power were important to him, as was drama, and attracting public sympathy. In line with what Alan Swingewood said in (Wahyudi, 2013) The rise of cheap publishing and mass production has shifted the position of writers from independence to a profession. After entering the industrial era, the market phenomenon that makes it easier for authors to get royalties then weakens the literary thematic that previously became the material for evaluating a work. Still overshadowed by mass culture, market tastes and the play of capital create distancing and alienation between literary content and symptoms in society.

CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION

The research findings are summarized in Chapter V. The results of this research are provided in this chapter.

A. Conclusion

From the analysis conducted on the novel The Woman In The Window (2018) by A.J. Finn by utilising Cathy Caruth's trauma theory and LaCapra's reconciliation efforts, it can be concluded that the novel The Woman In The Window narrates trauma and reconciliation efforts through the point of view of the main character who is a victim of an accident she experienced with her husband and daughter. In relation to this, the writer discovered that there are four symptoms of trauma experienced by the main character in this novel as well, there are intrusion, avoidance, hyperarousal, and addiction. In addition, the writer also discovered the way the main character reconcile with the trauma experienced.

The following conclusions can be drawn in accordance to analyze the novel The Woman in the Window by A.J. Finn using trauma theory of Cathy Caruth and the concept of Acting Out and Working Through by Dominick LaCapra. From the analyses conducted on A.J. Finn's The Woman in the Window, it can be concluded that The Woman in the Window narrates trauma and reconciliation through the point of view of the main character who is a survivor of the accident that killed her family.

The traumatic memory experienced by Anna Fox as the main character in the novel is the memory of when she had an accident during her holiday with her family where the accident killed her family. Anna Fox experienced severe trauma as a result of this. Anna Fox suffered from a variety of traumatic symptoms as a result of her terrible recollections, including, flashback, hallucinations, agoraphobia, denial, feel of guilty, death-drive, uncontrolled anger, and self-destructive.

The various memories and traumas that raged in Anna Fox's life made her suicidal. Anna, on the other hand, was able to get up and begin making steps to reconcile the trauma she had suffered. The first step Anna made to return to a normal existence so she could begin her new days was forcing herself to contact with the outside world. As a way of working through, she stopped blaming herself for the death of her husband and her daughter in the accident.

B. Suggestions

This study suggests that future researchers can conduct this kind of research using the same theory but with different objects. This is because there are still few studies that use Cathy Caruth's theory and Dominick LaCapra's concept to analyse trauma in a novel. By using the same theory, it is hoped that future researchers can find more things about the concept of trauma in the novel.
